On Wall Street's Fast Track

Paul Scialla set his sights on Wall Street early on. "I knew where I wanted to end up after I graduated," he said. To that end, NYU Stern was the perfect choice for his undergraduate business education. "Stern had the best access to internships, which made it the best fit for me," said Scialla.

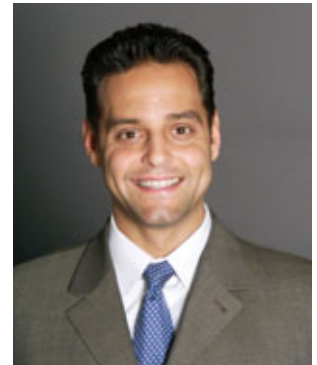

While he was a student, Scialla worked at Kidder, Peabody & Co., in its mortgage bond trading department. "I was interning and going to school full-time," he said. But it wasn't the trading that was the most intense part of his day. "Stern's campus was full of fast-paced people looking to succeed, looking to their future and harnessing the energy of New York City," he recalled.

After graduating from NYU Stern in 1995, Scialla accepted a position at UBS in the sales and trading department, where he worked for three years. In 1998 he moved to Morgan Stanley, where he ran the mortgage pass-through business for the next five years.

Scialla joined Goldman Sachs as a vice president in 2003 and was named a managing director in 2004. Then, after fewer than five years at the firm, he was named a partner in 2008. "It was an extremely exciting time for me," Scialla said. "My twin brother, Peter, who also graduated from Stern with me in 1995, made partner in the same year." It was the first time in Goldman's history that twin brothers made partner at the same time.

Today, Scialla is head of the US government, mortgage and agency bond trading businesses for fixed income at Goldman Sachs. "Navigating through the financial crisis was one of the biggest challenges in my career," he said.

With all of his responsibilities, Scialla finds it important to stay grounded and keep things in perspective. "I try to play sports and stay in shape both mentally and physically," he said. "I also give back to the community philanthropically any time that I can."
